THE WRONG HARRY.

"Helloo, Marvell! Going out of town

It was a misty, snowy February night, he lamps in the depot shinning like murky stars, the ringing of bells and shouting o officials sounding preternaturally loud through the fog, and the tide of travelers rushing hither and thither after the man ner of excited voyagers five minutes before the starting of the train.

. The gentleman thus debonnarily addressed as "Marvell" was a handsome sixlooter, with a fur-trimmed cloak, a tasseled traveling cap and a pair of very bright, prown eyes, just visible above his wraps and mufflings.
"Oh! its you, is it, Dixon?" he retorted,

"Oh! its you, is it, Dixon?" he retorted, with a genuine American hand-clasp. "Yee, I'm going up the river a few miles to visit some cousins I've never seen before."
"Girla?"
"Of course—do you suppose I'd encounter a night ride for any hulking some all all and a service of the service of th

"Lucky fellow," cried Dixon. "Wieh it was me. But, good-bye, my train is just was me. But, good-bye, my train is just off."

And darting away he was lost in the fog. While Mr. Harry Marvell, leisurely taking his scat in the cars, made such preparations as were practicable, under the circumstances, for a comfortable journey. "I supposs, of course, they'll be at the depot to meet me," he said to himself. And I dare say I shall like them very much, aithough they can't be very young. Three of 'em, too. Fancy me making small talk to an elderly aunt and three middle-aged maidens. Well, if skating is good, and there is game in the woods, I can manage two days without absolutely dying of ennui."

Thus cogitating Mr. Marvell fell fast saleep, and never awakened until the conductor shock him by the shoulder.

"Wan'ed to get out at Fair Oaks, didn't you. sir?" said he.

"Fair Oaks—yes," our here answered, staggering to his feet, and vaguely rubpling his eyes.

"Here you are, then! Look alive, sir!" shouted the conductor, swinging his lamp about as if were a magnified will-o'-the-wisp.

And Harry Marvell, half asleep, found hinssif standing staring on the platform, as the train glided slowly away, a moving line of fiery smoke floating above it.

"fe it Harry?" demanded a sweet feminine voice, close to him.

"Harry it is," he answered promptly.

"I'm Lottie!"

"Oh, you're Lottle, are you?"

"And here's Mamic—and Louise!"

"Glad to see you. I'm sure," said Harry, abaking in turn the hands that were offered to him, and beginning to perceive by the station light that his three cousinn were vary young, very dimpled and rosy and vary pretty, and that they were distracting costumes of blue velvet and chinchills fur, with gray plumes in their hats, and flessy yellow locks, blown hitber and thither by the brisk winter wind, like weven gold.

"I think he's getting to be a regular dandy," said Mamie, archly.
"And his voice is changed, too—and ba's a little taller, I think," added Lottie, neditatively. I think," added Lottie, meditatively.

Harry began to experience a disagree-able cease of something being radically wrong. The buffelo robed sleigh was decidedly comfortable—his propinquity to the blue eyed, thrush-voiced Louise was uxunious in the extreme, and his two viscoly was defined to the blue eyed. uxunous in the extreme, and his two visavis were dengerously pretty—but he besen to icel like an imposter.
